Het verhaal
van de eigen leefwereld,
wat me beschermt,

verhalen

Dimitri Casters

Light fell sharply onto his face as he grasped for breath, at the thought, he had been looking as a blind man on these paintings. Like the sun just took away colour, depth, concentration, it took away perception in a blink. He had to go back inside! He had to act normal and re-examine the paintings closely. Could he imagine? Would his recollection not fail him in building up the works arranging them around him? It's all in the search now and it couldn't look too obvious as he roamed through the rooms, trying to fit the pieces together.

Suddenly he remembered that Kiro had told him about the 4. And about how only simplicity can cause the infinitely complex to happen. It was that split-second memory, stored in the brain, that held all secrets and wisdom of the world. These millions of facts connected to tell the not obvious, to reveal the answers needed. But they should be 4? They had to connect in the right way to solve this. He only remembered them from his dreams. But he knew, there should be mutual recollection on this.

"Mister!", he heard a friendly but worried woman's voice say.

"Lost again a piece of time?", he tells himself, wondering how long he had been lying there. Moving away from the attention of this nice woman his steps felt lighter than they should as if they almost did not touch the floor. Could he fly now? Did he still not wake? This really did worry him. But should he worry about this if it was all a dream?

One thing is clear. Still alone, still learning and having a strange day
